“ For a while during high school, Ron and I talked practically every night on the telephone. I think we had a teenage crush but nothing really came of it-nothing romantic at least, just good friends. After graduation, we lost touch, which is what happens to many friends at the end of high school. However, 20 years later in 2001, we were again talking on the telephone about the 20-year class reunion, which he couldn't attend. He had been out-of-town on business the week before the reunion, and his youngest daughter, who was around 5 at the time if I recall correctly, had been staying with his folks. When he came back from the trip, his daughter was so happy to see him that he didn't come to the reunion. He was being a great dad, choosing the needs of his daughter over his personal desire of a rip-roaring class reunion. One of the last things he said to me as we talked on the telephone was this: "Tammy, you have the same laugh. It just lights up." That is one of the nicest things anyone has ever said to me. Even after all those years, Ron was still being a great friend. As we get older, I suppose we pay closer attention to what makes someone great and might even have some regrets, at least I do: I regret never having kissed Ron. I should have. Ron was a great friend, a great dad. He made a difference.
